For Immediate Release

Free one-stop service will help parents navigate mental health, substance use disorder resources Disorders affect more than 3,000 Kamloops area kids

Kamloops families with children and youth with mental health or substance use disorders have a new option for getting the help they need thanks to the Kelty Resource Centre -- a free, one-stop virtual resource centre that will link them to appropriate information and services tailored to their individual needs.

“I am pleased to officially announce the availability of this innovative new service. The Kelty Resource Centre is designed to help families at all stages of addressing mental health and addiction issues, whether they are just beginning to seek help or are already involved in services,” said Children and Family Development Minister Tom Christensen.

Dr. Jake Locke has worked as an outreach psychiatrist for the Kamloops Child and Youth Mental Health team for the past 10 years and believes the Kelty Resource Centre is a province-wide service that is long overdue.

“Like all BC communities, Kamloops has needed a resource service like this in order for families to find the appropriate care for their children with mental health and/or addiction concerns. Often these families are in crisis and don't have any idea where to begin looking for help. A great deal of unnecessary suffering may be potentially avoided,” said Dr. Locke.

“The Kelty Resource Centre will be a great resource for Kamloops and all of BC because there will finally be a place to start looking for help. It will provide triage and guidance when needed most,” he added.

Family members simply contact the Kelty Resource Centre by phone, or email, or they can visit it at BC Children's Hospital when in Vancouver. Centre staff will ask questions, help identify the family member's needs, and outline possible options such as providing direction to community intake resources through the Ministry of Children and Family Development (MCFD), and other services, useful websites, brochures, books, videos and other information.

The Kelty Resource Centre may be accessed in the following ways:

According to a 2002 research study conducted by Simon Fraser University for MCFD, approximately 15 per cent or 140,000 BC children and youth are affected by mental health disorders which cause both significant symptoms and impairment. Anxiety, conduct, attention and depressive disorders are the most common.

Substance use disorders affect approximately 0.8 per cent or 7,500 BC children and youth. Substance use disorders in children and youth are associated with many detrimental consequences including risky sexual behavior, increased risk for suicide, accidental deaths, and diseases such as HIV and hepatitis.

The Kelty Resource Centre is funded with the generous support of the Kelty Patrick Dennehy Foundation in partnership with BC Mental Health & Addiction Services (BCMHAS), an agency of the Provincial Health Services Authority, and BC Children's Hospital Foundation.

“The benefits of this health promotion initiative will include opportunities for prevention, early detection and intervention of mental health and addiction issues, increased understanding of the signs and symptoms, and greater awareness of the availability of help and where to find it,” said Peter Coleridge, VP education and population health, BCMHAS.

“The Kelty Patrick Dennehy Foundation aims to help remove the stigma and ignorance associated with mental disease through education, treatment and research,” said Ginny Dennehy.

The Kelty Patrick Dennehy Foundation was established in 2001 by Whistler residents Kerry and Ginny Dennehy after their 17-year-old son, Kelty, took his own life after battling depression. The mission of the foundation is to raise awareness of the magnitude of depression and the effect it has on young people and our society, and to remove the stigma associated with depression by taking a leadership role in education, effective treatments, and the research effort.

Potential future services available through the Kelty Resource Centre now under review for possible delivery include:

- Community-based child/youth mental health and addiction screening days
- Evidence-based, child- and youth-friendly information translated into different languages
- Development of inventory of treatment services available in BC for mental health and addiction issues.

The Kelty Resource Centre is part of an integrated provincial strategy to improve health literacy in mental health and addictions in BC. The strategy was developed by BCMHAS in consultation with regional health authorities, Ministry of Health, Ministry of Children and Family Development, BC Partners for Mental Health and Addictions Information, and other non-governmental organizations.

The Child and Adolescent Mental Health Programs at BC Children's Hospital are managed and administered by BC Mental Health & Addiction Services (BCMHAS), an agency of the Provincial Health Services Authority.
